SELF HELPS FOR THE NEW SOLDIER

Practical Home Hints on Military Training that Will Stand You in Good Stead When You Are Called to the Colors.

By A UNITED STATES ARMY OFFICER.

The Soldier's Responsibility A soldier's muscles must not only be strong—they must be elastic. He must be prepared to run, to jump, to crawl, to wriggle, to shoot or to handle the bayonet from the most unexpected positions. That is why he is put through the setting up exercises. By bending, thrusting with his arms and legs, raising himself from the floor, his body is made athletic and supple for every demand which may be imposed upon it. Military discipline begins with the muscles, must be imparted to the nerves, and become imbedded in the brain.

begins with the muscles, must be imparted to the nerves, and become imbedded in the brain.

A rounded shoulder is a slack rope. The soldier whose body sags out of shape spends almost as much energy in pulling himself together as he does in the specified motion itself. On the other hand, the man whose muscles are disciplined is at a balance, ready at once to respond to any command from the brain. When a man's muscles are soft they sullenly resent all orders from the brain. They have not learned to obey.

The nerves must be even more strictly disciplined. For even if a soldier's muscles are trained to execute any order he receives, if his nerves run away with him, good legs only carry him faster. And discipline of the mind is most important of all, for the mind administrates through the nerves.

A disciplined mind will think precisely. That is why military training requires that a soldier speak precisely, that he follow correct forms in receiving and transmitting orders, in making out reports, in addressing a letter. The crispness of military intercourse does not stunt mental development. But war is the most exact of modern sciences and a soldier must strive to become exact. In other words, he is simply taught how to think—not what to there a soldier must strive to become exact. In other words, he is simply taught how to think—not what to think.

As soon as a soldier begins to think he will understand his place in a group formation. He will learn that the handling of large bodies of men pivots upon the handling of a squad. He will familiarize himself with his work in a squad, and in that way discover his importance to the command as a whole. The squad consists of eight men, in two rows of four. It is under the command of a corporal. Two squads form a section, under the command of a sergeant. Three sections (at peace strength) form a platoon and two platoons a company. Three sections, plus a headquarters company, a machine gun company and a supply company, a regiment.

The young soldier learns that, as the squad moves, so the company or the regiment moves. He learns that if he individually executes the orders he receives in the appointed space and at the appointed moment, a whole regiment may wheel from squad to company front and back again, for example, without the loss of a step. Each part of the machine will fit perfectly into place. On the other hand, if he as an individual falls down in his part, the squad evolution is spoiled, the symmetry of the company is broken and the whole regiment suffers in consequence. The responsibility rests upon each man—this the young soldier must learn. And he must also learn that discipline is the quickest means yet devised to give any body of soldiers that perfect team work, that automatic, unconscious co-ordination without which battles and campaigns cannot be successfully planned and fought.

The next article will explain the fun-damental position of the soldier and its importance.

RECRUITS RUSH INTO ARMY AHEAD OF DRAFT

Thirty Join All Branches of Service in the District of Columbia.

Evidence that the prospect of being evidence that the prospect of reals drafted into service does not appeal to the young men of Washington was afforded by the rush at army and navy recruiting stations here. From a much larger number which applied, the different branches secured recruits as follows: Navy. 8: army. 2: Marine Corps. 12; Dis-Navy, 8; army, 2; Marine Corps, 12; District Guard, 2; naval reserve, 6.

Although eleven recruits were secured by the Marine Corps at its station here, the names of only five were available for publication. Twelve applicants were passed by the examining surgeon for the Marine Corps and the remaining names will appear towards. will appear tomorrow,
